

Environment-Fragility-Peace Nexus

Climate change is a compounding force in violent conflict, yet it can also bring people together to engender creativity and sustainability.

To address the nexus of environment, fragility, and peace, we're asking:

1. How can practitioners address environmental change and conflict together?
2. What are the preconditions and circumstances under which climate change can lead to social cohesion, gender equality, and sustainable resource use?
3. How can local knowledge of communities affected by climate change, especially Indigenous knowledge, support conflict management and climate resilience?

To answer these questions, CDA is collecting stories of communities that struggle with the impacts of climate change and conflict, yet thrive in the face of crisis.

As a trusted learning partner for 25+ years, CDA is creating tools and frameworks for more effective, accountable, and sustainable environmental peacebuilding programming using local capacities, knowledge, and resources.

CDA is actively looking for case study partners. Learn more at cdacollaborative.org or email dcampos@cdacollaborative.org.
